witnesses were called one by one. They told the judge, Miss Dragunaite (fnu), that at the prosecutor's office they had been threatened with imprisonment and deportation to Siberia and, as a result, had signed statements. It developed that no one had ever bought anything from the woman, and most of the witnesses were not even acquainted with her. One of the witnesses protested publicly: "Comrade Prosecutor, did you not threaten to deport me to Siberia? What could I do? If I had not signed, you would have put me in prison as you did the other witnesses. I can prove with hundreds of medical certificates that my wife has a serious heart disease. She would have died from such a shock. Who would have been responsible for her death?" The people in court began protesting and shouted that what the man said was the truth. The prosecutor, Mr. Peleckis (fnu), reddened, started shuffling his papers, and finally ordered the protesting witness to leave the courtroom at once. The chief witness for the prosecution also stated that he had been forced to sign a false statement. Basing his plea on those admissions, Mr. Sceponavicius (fnu), the defense lawyer, raised accusations against the methods of the militia and prosecution. None of this helped the woman, who was sentenced to five years' imprisonment. An appeal was filed and on 26 October 1950 the case was reopened before Judge Rajackas (fnu). Rajackas had some knowledge of law, since he had been a court clerk before the war. Rajackas reversed the Dragunaite decision. Prosecutor Peleckis appealed this new decision to Moscow, but Moscow decided against him. However, defense lawyer Sceponavicius was later dismissed from his duties for having spoken during the trial against the militia and prosecutor, and he now works as a clerk in the office of the Panevezys Food
